Many Custody Cases Being Complicated by Some Schools Not Reopening

August is almost always a tough month for parties going through divorce or custody disputes. In many cases, parties have trouble agreeing on where the children will go to school. The parties might also have trouble agreeing on who is going to pay the cost of private school if the children do not go to public school.

Prior to school beginning in August, many parties, unfortunately, end up in court on motions to modify or motions for contempt as it relates to these kinds of school issues. The litigation often involves where the children will go to school and who will be paying.

Many custody schedules have it setup where custody exchange revolve around the beginning and ending of school days. In other words, many parents drop off the children at school. The other parent then often picks up the kids after school is over.

With COVID-19, many school districts will not be opening up this Fall in a traditional sense. Instead, many school districts are going to be opening virtually. By opening virtually, many parents will now have to co-parent as it relates to homeschooling their kids through an online program.

Many school districts are making this decision due to safety reasons. With the spread of COVID-19, many school districts are concerned that students and teachers can quickly spread the virus.

In some cases, the parties will now end up having more face-to-face encounters where they are exchanging the children because it cannot take place at school. Custody exchanges can be a source of dispute. One party could be late for an exchange. Sometimes, somebody does not show up. In other cases, parties might engage in verbal discourse that is not productive.

As it relates to virtual schooling, one parent may have a concern that the other parent is not equipped or capable of handling virtual schooling during their custody time. Some parents might also be unable to do virtual schooling because they have to work. It might be that the children have to go with the other parent or the parties might need a tutor or childcare to assist with schooling.

In other situations, one party might wish to send the children to a private school that is going to be open versus leaving them in the public school, which will not be open. In some cases, parties might be able to agree. In other cases, they may not.

For many parties, they might consider engaging in mediation or collaborative law to attempt to resolve these disputes. For others, they may end up having to file a motion to modify to change the existing custody schedule because no agreement can be reached.

COVID-19 has been challenging on many levels. But the impact on custody cases with many schools not reopening is, unfortunately, going to be seen for many involved in the family court.

Getting soaked

City wrestles with Booth-Ferguson

UPON FURTHER REVIEW | Bruce Rushton

I am recently returned from two weeks on the road, where I social-distanced via motorcycle and lack of hygiene – six feet apart is no problem when you’ve been camping and haven’t showered in awhile.

The most memorable moment came the first night, when, caught in an OMG electrical storm, I slept in a car wash off Highway 36 in rural Missouri. If I’d left the next morning instead of departing after dark, if I’d heeded lightning ahead instead of pressing on, I would not have slept on concrete, soaked by horizontal rain delivered by epic wind.

While I was away, Mayor Jim Langfelder unveiled a plan for the downtown Booth and Ferguson buildings. The public tab – $3.15 million in tax increment financing funds – isn’t out of line with prior subsidies of almost $4 million, nearly $1 million of which has been spent. It sounds a darn sight more reasonable than $7.65 million in TIF money that the city council granted last year to a developer who, at last report, was banking on a Spanish financier to build a downtown hotel featuring a bowling alley and rooftop bar and an indoor swimming pool and a lot of other things that smart money always said would never transpire.

City council members who now squawk about the Booth-Ferguson proposal last year approved public money for the hotel-with-a-bowling-alley deal absent a financing plan and shortly before municipal elections, praising the project as a catalyst for downtown revitalization. Ward 1 Ald. Chuck Redpath said back then that it was a winner, despite a zillion unanswered questions. He now thunders about transparency and blasts Mayor Jim Langfelder for producing insufficient information about the Booth-Ferguson project: We should, he says, sic Attorney General Kwame Raoul on Rick Lawrence, the original developer who won TIF money under former Mayor Mike

Houston. In the course of failing to complete work, Lawrence didn’t pay $1.2 million in benefits for union workers, which has understandably upset organized labor.

The new developers have promised to make good on unpaid benefits. They’ve also promised to finish a project that will bring 41 apartments to a downtown where “For Lease” signs abound, and they haven’t blinked at the city saying not a dime of public money will be turned over until the project is finished. They’ve given the city financing plans, and they have track records.

Chesterfield Faring, a New York real estate investment firm that doesn’t shy from distressed properties, owns the note and is cobbling the deal. When and if the city agrees to TIF financing, the endeavor would be turned over to Tom Lee, who runs an East Coast construction management company, and Charles Everhardt, a Chicago financier who’s dabbled in video gambling enterprises and has built and redeveloped everything from gas stations to Hooters restaurants to historic buildings in the Windy City. Also, there was a failed attempt to bring a pro basketball franchise to Las Vegas.

They’re bottom feeders, but so what? There is nothing, per se, wrong with halibut. And the city might well be dealing with these folks again, given that Chesterfield Faring has acquired mortgages on the Illinois and PNC buildings in addition to buying the loan on the Booth and Ferguson buildings for $2 million, leaving the prior lender with a $1 million haircut.

The city council behaves as if it has the upper hand while downtown real estate sells for next to nothing, if it sells at all. Absent public subsidies, there’s no way that the Booth-Ferguson buildings will ever be more than they are today. The holdup is Lawrence, whom the new developers call a consultant and won’t discard. Council members and union types say no deal so long as Lawrence is anywhere near it. While the developers say that Lawrence will have no role managing the project, Lawrence tells me that he wants Siciliano Construction, his contracting firm, to have a shot at doing the work, which I’m guessing means that Siciliano would do the work. “If you steal once, you’ll steal again,” says Brad Schaive, business manager of Laborers Local 477. “Nobody’s against the project. It’s just that people know that Rick’s still in it.”

Rick Lawrence three years ago outside the Booth-Ferguson project that remains unfinished.

The city, years ago, should have better recognized risk. The city approved TIF financing under former Mayor Mike Houston even though Siciliano had failed to complete construction projects for public entities ranging from Springfield School District 186 to the Illinois Department of Transportation, according to a 2006 lawsuit filed against the company by Safeco, which had issued surety bonds. The failures came after the state withheld money for Siciliano’s work on the Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum. The state ultimately paid Siciliano what was owed under the ALPLM contract, with the company forgoing $5.5 million in claims for additional expenses, and the lawsuit was resolved out of court.

Lawrence now acknowledges mistakes in the Booth-Ferguson project and says he’s determined to make things right. He and the city council should remember that decisions come with consequences: If you ignore storm clouds, you risk sleeping in a car wash. The city needs to make this deal work because this trip needs to end, the sooner, the better. □

First, deal with police mental health

GUESTWORK | Stephen Soltys, M.D.

The current national discussion on policing in America has appropriately focused on systemic racism and brutality.

However, it has left out one key issue to which almost everyone appears blind: We are not going to get the quality policing we want until we have a concern for officer wellness in the area of mental health.

Policing is stressful. The average male police officer’s life expectancy is 21.9 years shorter than the average American.

While the rate for dying in the line of duty is about 9.3 police officers per 100,000 per year, the even more disturbing statistic is that the suicide rate of police officers is about 22 per 100,000.

Yes, police officers are more likely to die by their own hand.

One of the major issues for this disturbing statistic is the failure of police departments to recognize and treat post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) in their officers. Various studies have put the incidence of PTSD in police in the range of 4-18%. But some studies have placed sub-syndromal PTSD symptoms in up to 34% of police.

Many of the public don’t realize how often police are placed in life-threatening situations. A 2015 study of police in rural and small town settings found 42.6% were threatened with a gun at least once and 45.5% reported being threatened with other weapons. There were 29.7% who reported feeling trapped in a life-threatening situation.

Thus a career in policing is well-suited to developing PTSD. The person with PTSD has intrusive, involuntary and recurrent memories of traumatic events (flashbacks). The individual may have trouble recalling important aspects of the traumatic event and develop negative beliefs about life in general with persistent negative emotions.

Another significant symptom is arousal and reactivity resulting in generally irritable behavior with angry outbursts that can be reckless and self-destructive. Finally, there is a strong tendency to avoid reminders of traumatic events that can serve as triggers, including talking about

Editor’s note

Kenosha is a little smaller than Springfield, but not much, so it’s easy to imagine us in Kenosha’s place. Maybe Springfield police are trained better, so they wouldn’t overreact with a gun to somebody carrying a knife, but another police shooting could happen here. There is a strong and thoughtful Black Lives Matter movement in Springfield, so we could expect a responsible nonviolent protest here, along with violent looters eager to exploit it. If President Trump came to Springfield in the aftermath of an incident, how might he be welcomed to the land Lincoln?

Put science before politics

POLITICS | Rich Miller

When Gov. JB Pritzker announced the state COVID-19 “mitigation” plan for the Metro East on Aug. 16, he said it was done in conjunction “with local officials in the Metro East region and across the border in St. Louis.”

Last week, though, the governor admitted the cross-border arrangement to try to contain the virus’ spread was a “mistake.” Man, was it ever.

Instead of sticking to the state’s original mitigation plan, which would’ve included things like reducing indoor restaurant capacity and shutting down all indoor bar service, Pritzker only ordered bars and restaurants to close at 11 p.m. which was in line with what St. Louis was planning at the time.

But the region’s test positivity rate has since continued to rise to, as I write this, just above 10 percent, by far the highest in Illinois.

Then, last week, Region 7, which includes Will and Kankakee counties, experienced 8%-plus positivity rates three days in a row, which triggered automatic state mitigation.

According to a Belleville News-Democrat report, the Illinois Department of Public Health informed Metro East officials last Monday that their region’s state restrictions would be tightened to match those that were about to be imposed on Will and Kankakee, including a ban on indoor dining and drinking.

But the same Metro East Democratic legislators who demanded prematurely that Pritzker speed up the business reopening process way back on May 12 pitched a fit and Pritzker backed down.

The protesting Democrats did have a point, I suppose. Pritzker originally said the restrictions he put in place would last two weeks. The local politicians wanted the governor to stick to his word. And the governor’s own plan states that once a region meets the “resurgence criteria,” then a “tiered menu of mitigation options will be considered.” There are no actual hard and fast rules in his plan and those Metro East Democrats undoubtedly knew the loopholes going in.

But that meant Pritzker would be imposing significantly tighter restrictions on Will and Kankakee counties, even though the two counties have substantially lower positivity rates than the Metro East (8.4% vs. 10.4% as I write this).

And that set off Republican state Senators Sue Rezin and John Curran, who represent parts of Region 7. The two claimed the governor had “decided to place partisan politics above science.” The same rules should apply to all regions, they said, “and they should be based on science, not politics.”

It didn’t help that Pritzker failed to reach out to the two Republican legislators before making his announcement. So, they too had a valid point.

On a crass political level, the Metro East was instrumental to Pritzker’s 2018 Democratic primary win. It’s also a vitally important region for his “Fair Tax” proposal. Without the full and fervent cooperation of those powerful local political organizations, there’s no dispute that his tax plan will be in serious trouble.

The plain fact of the matter, however, is that Pritzker cannot on the one hand say he values science over politics and then on the other even appear to cave on political grounds.

There may have been sound reasons to try and equalize restrictions with St. Louis because the city is mere minutes away from everyone in the Metro East, which is small in comparison to the Missouri metro region. It’s not like the governor can close the bridges, after all. And, yes, Pritzker said he’d give the region two weeks. But he openly admitted last week that his actions clearly didn’t work. Sometimes, you just gotta bite the bullet.

That region is on the verge of getting totally out of control, if it isn’t already. Illinois can’t do anything about Missouri. Deal with Illinois.

Thankfully, Pritzker seemed chastened by the whole experience last week when pressed by a reporter. “I will readily admit that that was not a good idea,” he said. He should never, ever do this again.

And it’s long past time for those Metro East Democratic legislators who’ve been up in arms since May about the governor’s executive orders to loudly demand that their constituents finally take this pandemic seriously. There’s no excuse for this nonsense. The region is fast becoming a national hot spot, for crying out loud.

Several of those same legislators pushed hard to establish a large local contact tracing pilot program in St. Clair County. But experts have said contact tracing can be overwhelmed when the positivity rate is above 5%. It’s not a panacea. Do better. There is no easy way out of this. □

lonesome poem # 1

In a 1943 letter to my brother; I'm 15, he's 13, living out west for his health: he saved his mail. "It's lonesome being an only child with you in Arizona and Jo and Pat at college. I got home from school – everything's a grey-green-yellow, the sun shines brilliant and warm, spring in November. I couldn't resist getting on my jeans and romping with the dog and goat and cat I greeted the cows, walked on the stilts, fed Sugarpuss an oats treat, she nibbled from my palm with dainty goat lips. I thought about you and wished you were here because I am lonesome, and we would be having fun. I hope you are not feeling lonesome there at school."

MISCONDUCT ABOUNDS

Recently, there has been a parade of Springfield-area commenters deriding Speaker Michael Madigan for allegations against his Illinois House members relating to ethics and utility dealings. There are two glaring problems that undermine their credibility on the issue: 1) Locally seated courts' rejection of the State Officials and Employees Ethics Act legislation, passed by Madigan in 2003 and 2) Costly city utility misconduct perpetrated by unqualified and conflicted City of Springfield managers and officials.

As recently as 2019, courts in Sangamon County ruled against three days of trial evidence expert witness testimony in favor of expectations of untethered loyalty to rogue political appointee managers. What should have been a legal, factual and ethical no-brainer under the Ethics Act proved beyond the capacity of the judiciary seated in Sangamon County.

Regarding the debilitating influence of utility power, the City of Springfield could be a poster child for such unethical dysfunction. While the list of CWLP mismanagement and improprieties is long-storied, locals tolerate failed oversight of their utility. For example, when utility land use violations are brought forth by homeowners, the deciding factor depends on who the homeowner and violator happen to be, rather than the underlying harm caused by such violations. In fact, the city and its enabled utility retaliate against legitimate complainants rather than address the violations at hand, allowing the violations to continue for the favored violator.

The city's wrongdoing reaches so high that the city's inspector general even admits he is at a loss on how to deal with the misconduct. Understandably, it may be difficult to commit to service with honor and integrity in Springfield and Sangamon County in the face of traditional "as long as I get mine" indifference. Thus, Madigan's lead should be followed by the capital city's municipal and county governments.

For the sake of the people of Springfield and Sangamon County, it is time for politicians and public officials to stand up for what's right. Embrace ethics laws, rules and regulations and commit to work on a comprehensive plan with real accountability. Resist public corruption and pervasive misconduct once and for all.

And to the many other city and county enablers of misconduct, please step aside and let existing laws, rules and regulations guide the way to reform.

THANK YOU RABBI MARKS

REMEMBERING CHADWICK BOSEMAN

At age 46, Chadwick Boseman gave this world so much. While he was diagnosed with Stage 3 colon cancer four years ago, he was surely suffering and fighting it for much longer. In that time, he influenced our culture and society in ways that will be felt for generations. Imagine what he could have done with another 46 years in this world.

Chadwick Boseman was a kind soul who brought so much joy to his friends and family and was gracious enough to do the same for us all. He knew his time was limited, so he became the best person he wanted to be. He became a person people could aspire to be. He suffered and persevered while plagued with colon cancer. He exhausted his talents until his last breath. He showed us what true strength was. He lived in power, and now he gets to rest in peace.

Thank you, Chadwick.

Failing to identify and provide effective treatment for PTSD in officers can set the stage for bad events with the public.

Consider for a moment an officer with PTSD resulting from two life-threatening situations. That officer is now dealing with a member of the public who is being mildly disruptive.

The event location is close to the location of the first traumatic event and the disruptive individual is dressed like the individual in the second traumatic event. Surrounded by multiple triggers, the officer with PTSD may begin having flashbacks and respond to the situation based on the PTSD and not the real situation they are facing.

Why don't police with PTSD get identified? First, people with PTSD are reluctant to discuss their symptoms and in some police departments there is a culture that people should tough it out. But there are also consequences of acknowledging PTSD symptoms.

Many jurisdictions require an annual fitness-for-duty evaluation (FDE). If you are found not fit for duty because of psychiatric symptoms, you cannot work until the symptoms resolve. Yet in many jurisdictions, failing a FDE does not automatically qualify the officer for disability benefits. In such a case the officer may not be able to work and struggle without income while trying to get disability benefits.

All police departments need more funding (either from internal budget transfers or new funding) to provide routine preventative mental health services, to develop a culture where getting mental health treatment is promoted and to enact rules so a negative FDE for PTSD means automatic qualification for disability and treatment.

So as we discuss how to deal with systemic racism in our police departments, I hope we will also talk about how to make treatment available to those police who went into service with good intentions and were traumatized while serving.

To the extent we fail to deal with this issue, our efforts at community policing reform will fail. □

Douglas vs. Douglass

Park board wants community input on name change proposal

EQUITY | Rachel Otwell

Stephen A. Douglas was a complicated person. So said Samuel Wheeler, Lincoln scholar and former state historian. “If it weren’t for Abraham Lincoln, this would be the land of Douglas,” said Wheeler. Douglas – who was an Illinois resident, politician and lawyer – is largely known in Springfield for his debates with Lincoln. That’s apparent in the fact a Douglas statue sits prominently on the Illinois Capitol lawn, behind the one of Abraham Lincoln.

That statue of Douglas is slated to go, in the wake of calls from citizens and lawmakers to remove statues from the Statehouse grounds that serve to honor those who profited from slavery, namely Douglas and the state’s first lieutenant governor, Pierre Menard. As advocates for racial justice call for changes throughout the country, the movement means residents are also reconsidering the names of Springfield parks.

After a group of student organizers in Chicago demanded the change for years, a park there that was named after Stephen Douglas is now Douglass Park, named after abolitionist Frederick Douglass instead. Douglass was a former slave, famous orator and civil rights proponent. He had delivered a speech in Springfield, as reported by Illinois Times in April, and he met with Lincoln during his time as president.

Springfield park district trustee Lisa Badger introduced a proposal in mid-August to rename Douglas Park (943 W. Mason St.) after Douglass instead of the Lincoln foe. “There has been an extremely heightened level of civil unrest that this country has not seen in decades,” Badger said during the board meeting. She said she started receiving emails in May from people drawing attention to the fact Douglas Park was named after Stephen Douglas, and asking if it too could instead be named after Douglass. “There is a huge call from the community that they don’t want people such as Stephen Douglas honored, and furthermore we need to pay more attention to Black people in the community throughout time,” she had said.

Springfield attorney Don Hanrahan is a member of Springfield Call to Action, a progressive umbrella organization of advocacy groups. He addressed the board and later spoke with Illinois Times. “These symbols of racism, they have an effect,” said

Douglas Park was added to the Springfield park system in 1920 and sits on 26 acres.

Hanrahan. “It says something about how our community is going to address its specific and rather terrible history of racism. It’s just a start, we recognize that, but it’s an important start.” Hanrahan said the group is asking that the board remove the name of Douglas, that all park names reflect the diversity of the community, and that the process to rename the park and potentially others involve community stakeholders.

“History changes all the time. The way we live our lives today in 2020 influences the way we see the past,” Wheeler said. Wheeler said it’s a fact that Douglas profited from slavery, through a plantation in Mississippi in his wife’s name. Wheeler said Douglas, living in the North, knew the optics associated with attaching his own name could have a negative impact on his aspirations. Still, “The slavery system, slave labor, helped fund his political career, and so that is significant.” Douglas was a Union supporter, but one who advocated for popular sovereignty, that is the territorial right to slavery. His debates with Lincoln helped raise Lincoln’s profile. Douglas, a U.S. senator, also influenced the beginning of the Civil War. “He supported a series of political policies, legislation, that opened up the possibility of slavery expanding,” said Wheeler. And that’s not to be celebrated. “The American Civil War, in which 2% of the American population died, is a horrible tragedy in American history.”

Some suggested naming the park after Otis Duncan, a Black Springfield native and high-ranking lieutenant colonel during World War I. Badger told Illinois Times discussions are ongoing about the best way to solicit feedback from residents and how to proceed, but she hopes a vote is taken in coming weeks that would rename Douglas Park. And a broader look is also needed, she said. “We have over 30 parks ... we have one park named after a Black person. So it’s not representative of our community.” Black Lives Matter Springfield president Sunshine Clemons agreed. “We are trying to become more morally and socially aware as a society,” said Clemons. “It should have been done in the past. But just because it wasn’t doesn’t mean that we can’t correct that now.”

Badger said she plans to reach out to the Springfield and Central Illinois African American History Museum and other local groups that work on civil rights issues regarding thoughts on how best to proceed. “The time to do this is now, however we want to be very thoughtful and considerate about it.” □

CITY LOOKS TO GREEN IN CASH CRUNCH

CAP CITY Springfield budget director William McCarty had mixed news for the city council during a Tuesday budget update. On the plus side, the city has a $28 million fund balance, which amounts to 23% of the city budget, a record amount, McCarty said. That will help cushion a blow that McCarty said remains uncertain because the length and severity of the pandemic can’t be predicted. “It doesn’t mean there isn’t going to be some pain,” said McCarty, who didn’t rule out layoffs that he characterized as a last resort. “It’s imperative that we leave some of our reserves in place.” The city has slowed hiring, he said, and has 703 of 727 positions filled. He said he expects to realize $3 million in savings from unspent money. The city, he says, is considering whether to use proceeds from marijuana taxes to plug the deficit, which could require a policy change. The city last year approved a 3% pot tax that McCarty told the council will raise as much as $40,000 per month. Under the tax measure approved by the council last year, half the money is supposed to go toward reducing pension obligations and the other half is supposed to be used on economic development projects in disadvantaged areas.

ARCHITECTURE SCAVENGERS

CAP CITY Springfield architecture is getting a moment to shine. And for some lucky admirers, it’s going to pay. “The Architecture Scavenger Hunt” will challenge participants to find small features in downtown buildings. “This is a fun, socially distanced activity for people of all ages, including families who are home-schooling or who need a change of pace from remote learning,” said Ben Paoletti of Downtown Springfield, Inc. in a release. DSI is partnering with AIA Illinois, Illinois Realtors and Visit Springfield to host the events. There will be three hunts. The dates are Sept. 8, Sept. 22 and Oct. 6. The first 20 people to complete each hunt will receive $10 to be used at participating downtown businesses. Completed entries will also be entered into a drawing for larger increments of “downtown bucks” and other prizes. To participate, people can pick up clues from a DSI booth on the corner of Sixth and Adams streets on Sept. 8 from 4-7 p.m. Forms can also be picked up at the Visit Springfield Visitors Center (1 S. Old State Capitol Plz.) Wednesday through Friday from 9 a.m.-5 p.m. More information is at: tinyurl.com/y3g56jkb

Death of a thrift store

Salvation Army cuts services

NONPROFITS | Bruce Rushton

Springfield has lost nearly 100 beds for men, some homeless, recovering from drug and alcohol abuse.

In a video released last March, the Salvation Army said that railroad relocation plans threatened the adult rehabilitation center on 11th Street, where drunkards and addicts get help, and asked the public to contact elected officials to save 80 beds. About 100 people received services each month at the center, James Bracey, who ran the center and held the title of envoy in the charity, said in the video plea for help, and absent the center, people would end up hanging out at the library. “They’d probably start doing destructive things,” he warned.

Two months later, in May, the center stopped accepting new residents. Now, the Salvation Army says that the center, and an adjacent thrift store, will close permanently, with about two dozen job losses, even though negotiations for sale of the charity’s property to allow railroad expansion haven’t concluded and the engineering firm tasked with shepherding the project says that construction at the Salvation Army site isn’t expected to start for two years.

The Salvation Army says that thrift store revenue has fallen short of paying for the rehab center in recent years – the Springfield center has required $7 million in funding during the past five years above what central Illinois thrift stores have brought in – and that the pandemic has made things worse. The charity says that it also is closing an Indiana rehabilitation facility about 40 miles from Chicago due to financial difficulty. Major Randall Polsley, who oversees 15 Salvation Army rehabilitation centers in the Midwest, said that the Springfield facility, in addition to facing closure from the railroad project, is aging.

Those in need can receive services at Salvation Army rehabilitation centers in St. Louis and Chicago, the charity says. About 60 men stayed at the Springfield center on any given night, Polsley said, and they came from communities throughout central Illinois, not just Springfield. The charity has tried finding jobs for employees at the center, but there are no positions for about two dozen people, he said. With cuts already made at the rehabilitation center, the entire facility, including the thrift store, is set to close on Sept. 30. The charity’s other Springfield thrift store, on Wabash Avenue, will remain open.

“This is a difficult decision,” Polsley said. “Hundreds and thousands of lives have been transformed.” He added that he believes other local agencies can help meet the need. “Springfield, I’m sure, has its own network of recovery and treatment programs,” he said. “We were one of a number of providers.”

The charity’s thrift store business throughout the Midwest is suffering, Polsley said. More than 150 stores in the central part of the United States were closed for three months when the pandemic hit, he said, and they haven’t bounced back, despite an increase in donations early on that he attributes to pandemic spring cleaning. “We’re struggling to get shoppers back,” Polsley said. “We’re struggling to staff.”

While the Salvation Army shuts down its 11th Street facility, the charity also is negotiating the acquisition of land for the railroad project. Jim Moll, an engineer at Hanson Professional Services who is managing the project, says how much of the charity’s land will be acquired and at what price hasn’t been established. He said he doesn’t expect work to begin until 2022.

Mayor Jim Langfelder, who says he met last week with Bracey, said the charity wants the city to acquire the entire site. “They’re thinking it should be a full take,” the mayor said. “When we’ve had those conversations, maybe a month or so ago, the cost was pretty high up there.”

Sangamon County Circuit Court Judge John “Mo” Madonia said that the rehabilitation center has been a resource for defendants in the mental health court over which he presides. The court seeks treatment for mentally ill offenders as opposed to incarceration, and twice a year or so, Madonia says, the center has provided housing. It has also, the judge said, provided daily support services. He said he believes that defendants in drug court, where he doesn’t preside, may also have benefited.

“It is very useful for our needs,” Madonia said. □

COVID-19 and college

UIS on-campus students and faculty are getting tested weekly

HEALTH | Rachel Otwell

The University of Illinois is aiming to have its saliva tests used throughout the nation and world. The so-called Shield tests provide rapid results and were developed by researchers in Urbana-Champaign at UIUC. “Direct saliva testing can address bottlenecks of time, cost and supplies,” said Martin Burke in a release. “Our test also has unique features that enable fast and frequent testing on a large scale, and we are now working together with many partners to make our testing method broadly available as soon as possible.” Burke is a chemistry professor at UIUC and helped develop the tests, which are under FDA emergency authorization.

The tests are being used at all three U of I campuses, including in Springfield. The aim at UIS is to test weekly those who learn, live and work on campus. Testing, combined with contact tracing, provides a picture of where outbreaks are occurring and how to mitigate further spread. Interim UIS chancellor Karen Whitney has repeatedly described the coming school year as a roller coaster, and it’s already proven to be true.

“The lab is slammed in Urbana, and we’ve had bumps in the road,” Whitney said during an Aug. 27 UIS virtual meeting about COVID-19. The director of student support services explained the UIUC lab was backed up and not turning test results around within 48 hours as expected. That resulted in confusion for some over their test results. In the previous week’s meeting, 10 on-campus COVID-19 cases were reported as well as two off-campus cases. The confirmed cases were “a reflection of our on-campus testing program and exactly why we’ve implemented it,” Whitney had said.

On Aug. 28, the positivity rate for the week prior was .30% according to the UIS website. The daily positivity rate was higher, at .57%. The rate is the percentage of positive cases out of the total tests performed. UIS has established metrics for mitigation. Those start to go into effect when the daily rate for students living on campus is higher than .5% and higher than 1% for all staff and students learning and working on campus. The metrics also involve factors such as available quarantine space for students in dorms. “UIS is not closing unless the governor or the system head directs me to. The question gets into how will we operate,” Whitney told Illinois Times. Students and faculty who become ill will be dealt with on a case-by-case basis. Pauses in on-campus activity and a temporary shift to online learning for all are included as potential mitigation efforts.

Meanwhile, about 80% of students are learning purely online according to Whitney. Those who attend in-person classes must wear masks and keep a distance from others.

In Champaign-Urbana, 400 dorm rooms have been set aside for students to quarantine or isolate, according to Illinois Newsroom. Of more than 50,000 tests run in the week before school started on Aug. 24, 311 positive cases had been identified. A UIUC physicist told Illinois Newsroom that about 700 cases were expected by Thanksgiving. Information about cases beyond positivity rates is largely being kept private at campuses in Springfield and Chicago, including the condition of those who test positive. As of Sept. 1, the past week’s positivity rate at UIUC was .79%.

Across the nation, some colleges have quickly shifted to remote-only learning due to outbreaks. The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill decided to transition to online-only classes after the campus positivity rate rose to 13.6% in the first week of classes. In Illinois, outbreaks have been monitored at Illinois Wesleyan University in Bloomington, as well as Illinois State University. In McLean County, where both schools are, the overall positivity rate had risen to 10.1%, according to an Aug. 30 report from public radio station WGLT. The report said two weeks into the semester, about 1,000 college students in the county, mostly from ISU, had tested positive since the fall semester began. “The big question now is whether the college surge will stay relatively contained near campus or spread out into the wider community, where students have part-time jobs, go shopping and eat out,” the article read.

With Labor Day weekend ahead, the message at UIS is targeted at keeping students and faculty in line with best practices for a pandemic, namely good hygiene, social distance and wearing a mask. The latter two can prove difficult in the party situations holidays typically bring. A spokesperson for UIS said students will be encouraged to stay on campus over the break.

In-person learning is a privilege, said Whitney. There could be discipline for faculty and students who don’t abide by rules. So far though, “I’m impressed with how conscientious people have been, how thoughtful they’ve been,” Whitney said. “I’m very optimistic.” □

A generous community

Assistance becomes decentralized and more accessible

COMMUNITY | Carey Smith

"I can't work on a vaccine, but I can give what I have," says Cecelia Wendler, a Springfield resident who has been regularly fulfilling requests posted to the Springfield Families Helping Families Facebook (SFHF) group. "It's the immediacy of stepping in; it's very in-the-moment. It gives a sense of the lived concern for everyone in our community."

Since mid-March, new programs and funding sources have been rolled out through the city, state and federal governments, offering various forms of assistance to business and individuals. Around the same time, United Way of Central Illinois and the Community Foundation for the Land of Lincoln partnered to create a COVID-19 Response Fund. To date, more than $900,000 has been awarded in grants to dozens of nonprofits, including numerous food banks.

Yet hundreds of individuals have also stepped forward to offer assistance to others in need, often to people they don't know. Some givers and receivers connect through social media, while micropantries and Little Free Libraries allow both donors and recipients to remain anonymous.

Wendler says, "Watching the SFHF group over the last six months is what gives me hope. All of this movement of help, all over the city."

We're all in this together

Scott McFarland, Springfield District 186 school board president and executive director of the nonprofit Serve Illinois, created the Springfield Families Helping Families Facebook group soon after schools closed in March. Now at nearly 13,500 members strong, the much-touted group has met hundreds of essential need requests.

Katharine Eastvold, one of the initial members, thought it was a great idea and signed on to help moderate. She also helps to recruit volunteers and deliver food boxes.

Eastvold stresses that the group's purpose is not to fill requests, but rather, serves as "a platform for mutual aid. People are used to programs where organizations provide services. This is a far older form of helping each other," she said. Members of the group post requests, while anyone who can meet the need will grant the request. Often, members both give and receive.

"I feel the main reason people are in this group is that it helps people feel like they aren't alone. There are a lot of people who've not needed help before," explains Eastvold, noting that group members often encourage one another. "There's this feeling of 'we're all in this together.'"

Cecelia Wendler is a former critical care nurse and currently a professor at the Springfield campus of University of Illinois Chicago's School of Nursing. At the beginning of the pandemic, her brother offered some advice: "If it is possible for you to be generous, it is time to be insanely generous." Wendler took that as a radical call to action, although she says, "My efforts are small, compared to those who spend all their time helping others."

Wendler decided to focus her efforts on meeting two main needs, in addition to purchasing toiletries and sanitary items for micropantries. When formerly homeless people find housing but are in need of everything, she finds out their favorite color and purchases new, luxurious bath towels, then includes a gift card for the person to purchase other items.

Another effort is marking children's birthdays, sending cards with a crisp $1 bill for every year of their age. "It's a very small contribution, but it means a lot to me. I like to help kids feel special," she says.

"It gives me hope," says Wendler, of watching the interactions within the group.

Micropantries make a major impact

Lynn Ehmen, a Springfield mother of four, began working with micropantries after joining SFHF. At first, she fulfilled requests to deliver food, which led to making the 150-mile roundtrip drive to Dot Foods in Mt. Sterling on a weekly basis to fill her van with donations for distribution to micropantries.

She then joined forces with the nonprofit OpenWorld Relief to be able to accept donations, which to date has netted more than $17,000. Marine Bank locations serve as collection points for people who want to make a monetary donation. Ehmen has used those contributions to purchase materials to build 11 micropantries throughout Springfield and food to fill them.

Currently numbering two dozen, micropantries are available in all areas of the city and are filled with food and household supplies such as sanitary and hygiene products. Micropantries are refilled by volunteers daily, or sometimes even multiple times a day. Unlike traditional food pantries, micropantries are accessible by anyone with a need, 24 hours a day, no documentation required. Everything operates on the honor system.

More than five months into the pandemic, Ehmen says the biggest issue she sees is that there are more people with needs than there are volunteers to help keep the pantries filled.

"We try to get sponsors for each micropantry to fill it each day, but it's not enough. We need people who live around the pantries to pay attention and help stock them. We could help a lot more people if we had more help," she said.

Community volunteer and Enos Park resident Tiffany Lapp has added micropantries to her impressive list of volunteer efforts. From April through June, Lapp purchased items and filled three pantries, twice a week. "We all understand that there are people out there with needs," Lapp said. "Circumstances can change dramatically overnight."

Since the stay-at-home order was lifted, Lapp concentrates her efforts on filling the micropantry at Lanphier High School, closest to her home, once a week. Lapp says, "The micropantries are an excellent way to help out. Beyond food, paper products are very helpful: cleaning products, diapers, wipes, feminine products, toilet paper, dish detergent," noting that SNAP cannot be used to purchase these types of items.

Growing community gardens

When Ehmen was stocking the micropantry at Washington Middle School in early March, she happened to take a walk around the building and saw the big lawn behind it.

"Can you believe this?" she says with a sweep of her arm. "I knew I had to plant it." She called friends to help till and plant, and the Washington Middle School Community Garden was born.

Though community gardens throughout Springfield have different rules concerning harvesting – some for volunteers only, some for neighborhood residents only – the Washington Middle School Community Garden is free and open to the public. Any leftover produce goes to fill the micropantry in front of the school as well as other micropantries throughout Springfield.

Ehmen says that she has been gardening since childhood, as her family always had a large garden. After experiencing the death of a parent when she was a young child, her family was on the edge of homelessness for a time, which has filled her with a deep empathy for the struggles of others. "There but for the grace of God, go I," she states.

Alana Reynolds, founder of Grow Springfield, an organization that encourages community gardening and urban farming, has helped coordinate the Butler Elementary School Garden for several years. Though not open to the public for harvest, the garden normally plays an integral role in school life, with produce used in curriculum for the 350 students, and an after-school program encouraging students to harvest and cook.

Since schools have closed, the Butler Elemen-out asking for it," says Clark.

This year, Ecofluent has focused on providing and planting 32 fruit trees at area schools and community gardens, free of charge. Ecofluent is currently working with the city of Springfield to purchase vacant lots in hopes of planting more gardens that would be accessible to the community.

"We (need to) build resilience for crisis response so that we have a local source for food and basic needs to be met. We shouldn't have hunger in the United States," says Clark.

Katharine Eastvold of SFHF agrees with the efforts toward decentralized and more accessible food distribution, noting that there is not a shortage of food available, but challenges in how people can get food.

"Delivery of services to where people are needs to be more systematic," she says. "We have daily needs for delivery of food bags and boxes. We need to reimagine how we make it available to where the people are. We need more concerted efforts to bring food to different neighborhoods, to break down barriers."

Many students rely on school food

When schools closed in mid-March, Springfield District 186 continued to provide breakfast and lunch for students during the week via distribution sites, but some parents were not able to access the prepared meals for their children due to lack of transportation. According to the most recent data available, more than 55% of students in the district are considered low-income.

Though she does not have children, Megan Philpot of Springfield became aware of the acute need for meal delivery through SFHF. She began delivering to a few families at first, but very soon the need became more than she could personally fulfill. Philpot recruited a dozen volunteers to deliver more than 200 District 186 meals a day to students throughout the spring and summer.

Philpot also took in donations to provide for weekend meals. "There was no other way to get this done except to do it yourself," she says.

Working remotely with United Service Organizations, a job with a flexible schedule, has been key in Philpot's volunteer efforts. She says the desire to help others was ingrained in her as a small child.

"Growing up, my family's mindset was, if we can help people, we should. It is important to help when we are in a fortunate situation, and we hope people can help us if we are in an unfortunate situation."

Many of the volunteers Philpot has recruited were surprised to see the poverty and dire needs families endured even before COVID-19 came into the picture. "We all live in our bubble, and you don't recognize how other people live. We were very surprised, and sometimes it was sad. But at least the kids were being fed," says Philpot.

In addition to the volunteers and recipients that Philpot coordinated through SFHF, a tremendous group effort took place among Springfield District 186, Springfield Immigrant Advocacy Network, Regional Office of Education, Compass for Kids, Matheny-Withrow Elementary School, parent educators and dozens of community volunteers to serve additional meals. Families in need had to be identified, meals prepared and packaged, distribution points set up throughout the district and delivery routes mapped out for families who were unable to pick up food. The school district prepared 12,000 to 13,000 meals each day.

Deliveries to students will begin again after Labor Day, and Philpot says there is “a huge need” for additional volunteers throughout the school year.

Food pantries struggle

While people in need have traditionally relied on food pantries for assistance, established food pantries throughout the nation have been hit hard. Many have seen a sharp increase in requests even as donations have declined and supply chain issues have led to distribution challenges.

“From March through July 2020, Central Illinois Foodbank distributed nearly one million more pounds of food, the equivalent of approximately 833,000 meals, compared to the same time frame last year,” states Jane Kiel, finance director at the Foodbank.

Sharon Brown, executive director of Kumler Outreach Ministries, says, “In March, our pantry was inundated due to job layoffs and schools shutting down.” In a few weeks’ time, the demand leveled off as schools were able to pivot to provide food for kids at home and people began receiving Pandemic EBT (Electronic Benefits Transfer, formerly known as food stamps).

However, an uptick in demand for food has recently begun, due to unemployment benefits decreasing and the gap between the school district’s summer food assistance program and meals provided during the regular school year.

Unlike some food pantries, Kumler was not affected by supply chain issues, as the pantry normally keeps several weeks of food on hand. Central Illinois Foodbank also provided assistance, as the Foodbank was able to access nonperishable staples with aid through the federal CARES Act.

Donations, however, “are down significantly,” says Brown, noting that they were not able to hold neighborhood food drives on a monthly basis throughout the summer as they normally would, due to concerns about COVID-19.

The Eastern Illinois Foodbank, serving 18 counties in Eastern Illinois, experienced several supply chain issues such as delivery delays, price increases and a decrease in most types of donations at the beginning of the pandemic, according to Gavin Gordon, assistant inventory manager. At the same time, there was a significant increase in demand.

“During the month of April, we saw close to a 50% increase in new clients,” says Gordon. “The biggest change has been in the way we and our partner agencies distribute food. Most have moved to a pre-boxed, drive-through distribution model. It keeps everyone safe, but it does not allow for as much client choice.”

A different kind of hunger

In addition to micropantries, community volunteer Tiffany Lapp has another passion: books. As a board member of the nonprofit Northside Children’s Community Library, she spends a lot of time collecting donated books and redistributing them.

Over the winter, Lapp learned that the Citizens FBI Academy was co-sponsoring Little Free Libraries in the form of a rebate for people who purchased a ready-made one. Lapp and her husband Jeff, an FBI employee, ordered one through the national website and were waiting for the ground to thaw to install it in their yard.

“When the stay-at-home order started, I realized the need to put it in a centralized location rather than my front yard,” said Lapp. “I got permission to put it up next to the micropantry at Lanphier.”

The Little Free Library movement has been around for over a decade, usually with homeowners erecting a weatherproof container in their front yard. A similar concept to micropantries, a Little Free Library provides 24-hour access to books, free of charge, without fines or returns. Currently, there are more than 100,000 Little Free Libraries in over 100 countries, with millions of books changing hands.

With many public libraries closed and children home from school, Little Free Libraries have been a boon to communities. There are now more than 30 Little Free Library locations in Springfield, with more added all the time.

Lincoln Park resident Debbi George says, “I’ve always wanted a Little Free Library, so I asked my husband to build me one for my birthday.” She asked her favorite artist, Felicia Olin, to paint it for her with whimsical characters and says she’s had a very positive response. “I thought in these difficult times, since the libraries weren’t open, this would be a good idea.”

Land of Lincoln Bookshare is a nonprofit started in 2017 by best friends Tina Carnes and Tiffany Roe. Their aim is to collect donated books and redistribute them to Little Free Libraries, students and the public at large through events such as farmers markets, festivals and craft shows. The pandemic has cut off many of their normal avenues of distribution. Normally, the organization distributes 300-500 books each week, but with an oversupply of donations, the women have had to take a break from accepting book donations.

“We’ve been filling libraries around town all summer. We did a lot of porch drop-offs in the beginning of the pandemic. We recently donated almost 500 kids’ books to Cherry Hills Baptist Church for their book fair. We’ve dropped off books at nursing homes. We’ve had to get creative,” says Carnes, of their efforts to put books into the hands of those who need them.

A Little Free Library on the west side of Springfield made the news last summer when it was set on fire. “Quite a few popped up after that. It became more well-known, and neighborhoods stepped up in response,” states Carnes. The website littlefreelibrary.org has a searchable map, as well as instructions for individuals who want to build or purchase a ready-made Little Free Library.

With few events resuming yet, Land of Lincoln Bookshare has been distributing a couple of hundreds books every week through Little Free Libraries at locations in Springfield and beyond. “We’re bringing books to the neighborhoods,” says Carnes. “It allows people to gain access to resources, especially in book deserts. Books are essential.”

A generous community

Despite the hardships of the last few months, one benefit that has emerged from the pandemic has been an increasing awareness and connection between those in the community who have means and those who do not. As there continues to be a societal movement to recognize and acknowledge privilege, direct forms of assistance provide a way for people to go the extra step and use their privilege to benefit others. Groups such as SFHF have become a platform where marginalized and privileged groups can meet, and in some cases, those who give assistance also receive assistance.

In her role as a moderator for SFHF, Eastvold says, “I have learned a lot about resources and needs.” She feels that the group has raised awareness of how many families lack reliable transportation, helping those who have means to realize that there can be barriers for those in need, even when assistance is available.

“It’s not always easy to access social services. I’ve seen a lot of those moments where people realize there can be a lot of difficult steps for people,” says Eastvold.

Lapp says, “I should have been a statistic,” when asked about her volunteer efforts, which total more hours each week than a full-time job. “But I wasn’t. There were lunch ladies, art teachers, librarians who showed they cared about me. The kindness is a big deal,” she says of her own difficult childhood.

Audrey Bessette, a mother who has both given and received help through SFHF, says, “The things I see people do for other people in need, it makes my heart feel so good.”

“I’m not really surprised at the generosity of this community,” says Eastvold. “I have experienced this as a very generous, very giving community. It’s been incredible seeing it happen through SFHF.” □

Fluffy homemade pancakes

Sure to please your crowd

FOOD | Ashley Meyer

Whether they're the centerpiece of a lazy Saturday morning brunch or hastily gobbled up on a hectic weekday, fluffy homemade pancakes are a sure crowd pleaser. Pancakes generally freeze well, separated with waxed paper in a zip-close bag, so it's easy to make a big batch and get a jump on meal prep for the week ahead.

Paramount to making tender, fluffy flapjacks is not over-mixing. Two things happen in baking when mixing dry ingredients together with liquid ingredients. Firstly, the gluten in the flour becomes activated when it's combined and mixed with liquid. The more the dough or batter is worked, the more gluten will develop. That's why chewy well-structured artisan breads are often kneaded for several minutes, in order to develop a strong network of gluten that will trap the air bubbles produced by the yeast. Secondly, when making quick breads like pancakes and muffins, the delicate air bubbles that are created by the reaction of the baking powder and baking soda coming into contact with the liquid ingredients are easily burst by over-mixing. That's why lumps in pancake batter are actually ideal. After mixing let the batter rest for 20 minutes, especially if baking with whole-grain flours. This resting period gives the gluten that's developed time to relax and the starch in the flour to swell.

Cook pancakes on medium low heat in order to give them time to cook evenly without getting too brown. I don't add butter or oil to the pancake batter, but I do use a liberal amount on the griddle when I cook them. Scoop about ¼ cup full of batter onto a well-buttered skillet, making sure to leave plenty of room around each pancake. If you want to make blueberry, banana or nut pancakes, now is the time to sprinkle them on top of each cake. Resist the urge to flip them too early – there should be bubbles evenly dotted on the surface of the batter. They will only take half as long to cook on the other side.

Perfect pancakes

Diastatic malt powder is the secret ingredient for getting that classic "diner" pancake flavor. Order it online or look for it at specialty homebrew stores.

2 cups flour (whole wheat, all-purpose, or a combination)

2-3 tablespoons diastatic malt powder, or substitute 1 tablespoon sugar, or just omit entirely
2 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon baking soda
3 eggs
2 cups full-fat or low-fat yogurt or buttermilk

(To make apple spice or pumpkin pancakes, substitute two cups applesauce or one 15-ounce can pumpkin for the yogurt, along with apple or pumpkin pie spice to taste.)

Combine the dry ingredients in a mixing bowl. In a separate bowl, thoroughly whisk together the eggs, yogurt and ¼ cup water or milk. Add this to the dry ingredients and mix gently to combine. Avoid over mixing. Set the batter aside to rest for 10 minutes while you heat the griddle.

Drop spoonfuls of batter onto a preheated buttered griddle and cook until bubbles begin to form in the middle of the pancake. Flip once and continue to cook until pancakes stop steaming and spring back lightly when pressed in the center. Makes 10-12 four-inch pancakes.

Almond pancakes

These are a delightful low-carb option that's well received by kids and grownups alike.

As much as I love a big stack of traditional pancakes, I often feel bogged down by an overload of carbs first thing in the morning. Filled with protein-rich almonds and eggs, these simple griddle cakes are delicious topped with a simple fruit compote. Combine fresh or frozen berries with a tiny pinch of salt and a small amount of water and bring to a boil over medium low heat. Stir frequently and simmer until the mixture bubbles and the berries begin to burst. Remove from heat and add honey or maple syrup to taste. Freeze or refrigerate for up to one week.

1 ½ cups almond flour
2 tablespoons coconut flour
1 teaspoon baking powder
¼ teaspoon baking soda
¼ teaspoon salt
3 eggs
½ cup plain yogurt, kefir or buttermilk
1 teaspoon vanilla extract and/or ¼ teaspoon almond extract (optional)
Zest of one lemon (optional)

Prepare according to the directions above.

Savory sweet corn pancakes

¾ cup flour (AP, whole wheat or cup for cup gluten-free flour)

¼ cup cornmeal
1 teaspoon baking powder
½ teaspoon baking soda
1 egg
1 ¼ cups buttermilk, or substitute plain yogurt thinned with a little milk
1 ear fresh sweet corn, or ¾ cup frozen corn kernels
2 green onions, sliced
1 jalapeño, finely diced (remove the seeds to make it slightly less hot), or one small can diced green chilis, drained

Microwave the ear of corn in its husk for three and a half minutes. Let it sit until cool enough to handle, then pull away the husk and silks. Use a sharp knife to cut off the kernels by holding the ear vertically by the top and slicing downward. Do this in a mixing bowl to limit the mess. Add the egg, buttermilk, chopped green onion and chilis if using. In a separate bowl combine the dry ingredients and mix well, then add to the egg-buttermilk mixture and mix gently.

Cook according to the instructions above. □

Pretentious Tenet a muddled mess

FILM | Chuck Koplinski

Warner Brothers was concerned that by releasing Christopher Nolan's Tenet in overseas markets first that key plot points and twists would flood the internet, ruining the many secrets the film has in store. They shouldn't have worried – I couldn't tell you what this movie was about if my life depended on it.

Expectations surrounding Tenet couldn't be higher. Nolan's reputation is such that he's one of the few filmmakers whose name above the title can put butts in seats, and that's just what Warner Brothers is hoping his latest will do – persuade viewers to overcome their COVID-19 fears and come back to see his latest on the big screen. Whether it will succeed or not is to be determined, though a first-week European take of over $50 million is a good sign. However, I think that after the opening weekend in every market, word will get out that it simply isn't worth the ticket price, let alone risking your health.

As I say, the studio's request that critics keep the plot's secrets close to our vests will be easy. A horribly wooden John David Washington is The Protagonist (no, I'm not kidding), an American operative who, after a seemingly botched mission in Russia, is told that his life-risking derring-do was nothing but a test to see if he has what it takes for a special assignment. Given little to go on, he's sent to Europe where he's shown some mysterious artifacts. This leads to a globetrotting adventure that features hidden cities, the possibility of nuclear annihilation, forged art works and, as with many of Nolan's films, an obsession with time and its relentless march.

The first act is replete with one exposition dump after another in which characters are required to provide background to their lives, explain key events and, in Nolan's films, go over the rules by which their respective world operate. So much information is thrown at the viewer, it's hard to keep up with exactly what's going on. In the end, it doesn't matter who is who, what side they're on or just how this brand of time travel works. The director has other fish to fry.

Nolan is obviously in on this joke. Key moments in which seemingly key plot points are being explained are purposely drowned out by Ludwig Goransson's abusive score or sound effects that are turned up to 11. Important clues are dispensed by characters with masks or breathing devices on or while they're operating a catamaran, water loudly splashing as they do. The story is inconsequential. Nolan has always been about dazzling us with grand set pieces and with their complex choreography and meticulous execution, it's obvious this is where his interest lies. To be sure, the grand action sequences on display here are impressive, a scene involving a jumbo jet crashing through an airplane terminal being the highlight.

But that's not enough.

The biggest problem with the film is its lack of heart. This is a cold exercise lacking an avenue through which the viewer can become emotionally engaged. Nolan's best work, The Dark Knight trilogy, Inception and Interstellar, all feature characters we sympathize with because they are striving to be reunited with or save people they genuinely love. That aspect is non-existent here; instead, we're given poorly drawn characters who are nothing but props awash in the filmmaker's over-produced set pieces. Early on, one of the characters advises, "Don't try to understand it," which proves to be good advice where Tenet is concerned. Better yet, just don't see it. □

Music labors

NOW PLAYING | Tom Irwin

Welcome to the land of music-making possibilities in central Illinois as we roll our way into the first weekend of September, which in the calendar of holidays, drops us into Labor Day territory. This time is typically known as the end of the summer season, with Memorial Day as the other bookend, but with this year being anything but typical, you can call it whatever you want as far as I'm concerned.

Normally, this weekend would be chock-full of cookouts and parades with bands galore knocking out the tunes for partying people working for the three-day weekend full of good and glorious times. But alas, we are not in normal times and things are more than a little bit different, but there are some cool goings-on going on that if done decently and by following guidelines, will allow us all to celebrate the 2020 Labor Day weekend safely, sanely and with some well-deserved, slight respite from our COVID-19 inhabited world.

Our friends at the Curve Inn labored to make you a super-duper weekend with a Lick Creek acoustic set being set for Thursday, Wreckless Whiskey shooting in on Friday, Highway 615 driving out Saturday and Deja Voodoo doing it on Sunday. Be sure to wave at Ric "Skippy" Major, a several-time winner of Illinois Times' Best of Springfield award as soundman, who is now back turning knobs painlessly at the board after a short break for wrist surgery.

Long Bridge Golf Course has award-winning blues artist, harmonica player, singer, entertainer and songwriter Brandon Santini with his band on Friday night, then tops off the weekend with the one and only Mike Burnett joined by a special guest, the nationally acclaimed, Chicago-based guitarist originally from Springfield, Andon Davis.

For a "kool" Saturday afternoon show, one of the finest groups ever to be from and play in Springfield, Kapital Sound, lights up the daytime with a noon to 3 p.m. concert at the Y-block just north of the Governor's Mansion on Fourth and Jackson. Head on down south to Chatham where the 3Sixteen Wine Bar (they have more than wine, including fine food and a full bar) presents a Labor Day weekend spectacular celebrating the establishment's three-year anniversary with three acts in three days. Friday gives us David Francisco, a 2018 American Idol finalist and singer-songwriter with a compelling story to tell in words, music and deeds. Saturday delivers a James Taylor Tribute (with some Paul Simon and Jim Croce too) by Peoria-based entertainer James Herr, and on Sunday, one of our area's best blues performers, Robert "Lefty Preacher" Sampson, drops in to do his thing and do it well.

Most certainly the largest happening this weekend happens at Danenberger's Family Vineyards when ElderBeard MusicWerx presents the Folkin Boogie Family Retreat. You're invited to this three-day event replete with camping, concerts (electric and acoustic), workshops, wine tasting, gourmet food, glass blowing, yoga, circus-style street performers and who-knows-what-else will go on on the exciting and expansive grounds of DFV, set in the country on the way to New Berlin from Springfield. Bands include Sunshine Daydream, Still Shine, Alabaster, Birds of a Feather (Phish Tribute), This One's Pink (Pink Floyd Tribute), Brainchild, The Leadfoot Band, Solar Chariot and guaranteed interesting performances by a peculiarly presented group called 217 Burlesque & Curiosities Troupe, plus other stuff and side stage acoustic acts as well. You can find more info, get your tickets and see the COVID guidelines for this well-planned and safely set up weekend-long shindig on ElderBeard's Facebook page.

Here's wishing you and yours a delightful and safe Labor Day weekend. □

it This internationally renowned singer/songwriter, recording engineer, studio owner-operator, multi-instrumentalist and spinal cord-injury survivor has a story to tell and he's been telling it wherever he goes. From a captivating American Idol Hollywood performance to appearances on major television shows such as Ellen, stage-sharing with Martina McBride, Steven Curtis Chapman and Chris Blue, plus speaking at MusicCares during the Grammy's annual fundraising gala with Katy Perry and Kacey Musgraves and having his story documented in the short film Back to Blackbird, Mr. David Francisco has come a long way in a few years from his hometown of Knoxville, Tennessee. His compelling story keeps only getting better and stronger as now he's opened up his own recording studio, Lionheart, based in the home he shares with his wife, Kristi, near Los Angeles. He continually travels the country doing motivational and inspirational speaking, while performing his songs with Kristi all designed to help others think big dreams, then reach out to make those dreams a reality and keep the positive vibes moving.
